Cop's arrest roils Troy

A 26-year veteran police sergeant was arrested Friday morning by the New York Police Department on charges accusing him of committing computer crimes dangerous to minors, city police said.

Sgt. Patrick Rosney, 53, was arrested Friday morning when he arrived for work at police headquarters. He was handcuffed while in uniform. It was a sting operation involving a New York City police officer posing as a 14-year-old girl, according to several people briefed on the arrest.

Rosney was allowed to change into civilian clothes before he was driven to Queens to be arraigned for first-degree attempted dissemination of indecent material to minors, a felony and attempted endangering the welfare of a child, a misdemeanor.

Rosney was suspended without pay for 30 days when he was arrested. Rosney's fellow officers were shocked and angered by his alleged actions, Tedesco said.

"We are a strong department. We are a department of character. We expect a rough road," Tedesco said.

"To see a police officer in handcuffs is very disturbing and hurtful," said Officer Robert Fitzgerald, president of the Troy Police Benevolent Association. Mayor Lou Rosamilia said the city would cooperate with the NYPD investigation. "The allegations in this case are deplorable," the mayor said. "This is a deeply disturbing incident, and certainly not reflective of the overall character and quality of our police department."

PEDOPHILES: NATURE VS. NURTURE

Pedophiles are not easily identifiable because they come from all genders, races and positions in life. According to Marist College psychology professor Dr. Linda Dunlap, 30 percent of abused children are by family members and as many as 60 percent are abused by people that family trusts, such as teachers, coaches and clergy.

Why do pedophiles act in such a way? Some of it is nature, as in a mental illness, and some of it is nurture, perhaps because they were molested as children, experts say.

The well-adjusted male makes the decision, with the prefrontal cortex of his brain, not to act, perhaps making a non-play based on morals ("This is wrong," or "This would ruin my life if I got caught"). The pedophile, however, has poor impulse control and acts upon it, said Dr. Paul Schwartz, a psychology professor at Mount Saint Mary College. "When we are tired or upset or overly distracted, our ids pop out all over the place," Dunlap said, regarding the impulse for immediate satisfaction of primitive needs. "We want something and we want it now ... the consequences are literally gone. I think people that have these kinds of impulse controls, ultimately they can say, 'I know it's wrong but I couldn't help myself.' "For us, as hard as it is to believe and repulsive to those of us that don't abuse children or wouldn't consider it, they don't realize it's a sickness, just like other sicknesses (like) the alcoholic who continues to drink," Dunlap added.
